Britain exports Susannah and Michael York Conduct Unbecoming

Rock groups, Rolls Royces and Scottish whiskey aren't the only British commodities America imports. Thanks to a tradition of formal dramatic instruction, England has also contributed innumerable actors to Broadway and Hollywood. Two recent examples are seen together for the first time in Conduct Unbecoming. Sharing identical surnames, Michael and Susannah York are prime examples of Britain's fourth largest export.

Born March 27, 1942, Michael York spent most of his childhood acting in semi-professional theatrical companies including the National Youth Theatre. However, it was only when Sir Laurence Olivier selected him for London's National Theatre that Michael received widespread recognition. Cast opposite Albert Finney in Much Ado About Nothing, Michael impressed visiting director Franco Zeffirelli enough to get signed for his first film, The Taming of the Shrew.

Moderate success as a star in Romeo and Juliet, ten small pictures, and a leading role in BBC-TV's Forsythe Saga, served to prepare him for his most notable part, with Liza Minnelli, in Cabaret. This in turn led to starring roles in Murder on the Orient Express and The Three Musketeers.

Susannah York also bridged the gap from semi-professional to film star by way of the theatre. Trained as an actress at the highly selective Royal Academy of Dramatic Arts, Susannah starred in her first film, Tunes of Glory, at age 19. Again a series of small pictures and a number of television plays prepared Susannah for her first major part with Montgomery Clift in Freud.

Her role in Tom Jones gave her an international name and launched Susannah into a series of blockbust-ers including They Shoot Horses, Don't They? After a two year pause devoted to her family, Susannah resumed work in Gold and The Maids.

Comparing the stage to film, both Yorks find the theatre more fulfilling. It's Michael's opinion that film acting tends to be little more than "providing the essential raw material for someone to cut into shape." Susannah believes the intimate atmosphere of live theatre prompts "the hope that people will leave bigger than when they came in." Either on stage or in film, there's a bright future in store for England's exported pair.

Warren Beatty is films' foremost hairdresser

Shampoo

By Gary J. Prebula

One afternoon in 1959 Warner Brothers' president Jack L. Warner gathered the Hollywood press corps together to introduce an up and coming superstar. Fresh from acclaim hailing him as "the new Marlon Brando" actor Warren Beatty hulked nervously behind Warner's diminutive figure during the overly long introduction. Finally, the resident movie mogul got around to the matter at hand by presenting him as "one of our bright new stars—Warner Beaker."

In spite of his blooper, Warner's prediction proved more accurate than even the illustrious Mr. Warner could have imagined. In less than two decades, the thirty-nine year old Beatty has starred in 14 major pictures. In addition his career has expanded to include producing and co-scripting two modern film classics, Bonnie and Clyde and Shampoo. The first earned 10 Academy Award nominations, the latter broke Columbia Pictures' all time box office record. As a star, producer, writer and forthcoming director, Warren Beatty has become one of the major powers in today's Hollywood.

Born in 1937 in Richmond, Virginia, Beatty was the star center on his high school football team before venturing to Northwestern University to study law. The success of his sister Shirley MacLaine and boring classes prompted Beatty to quit after his freshman year and take a job as a Manhattan construction worker. Drama school and live television bit parts soon followed.

A role in summer stock brought him to the attention of playwright William Inge and director Joshua Logan. Inge wanted him to star in his new play, A Loss of Roses, while Logan offered him the lead in Parrish. Inge won and Beatty went on Broadway for a disappointing 25 performances before the play died. Inge kept faith in him and recommended Beatty to film director Elia Kazan for Splendor in the Grass. With that success his star began to rise.

By 1966 Beatty was in a position to gamble. Branching out, he discovered a script originally intended for François Truffaut, and bought it. Along with screenwriter Robert Towne (Chinatown), Beatty revised the story for director Arthur Penn. The film opened to negative reviews and was quickly yanked from the theatres. But Beatty's perseverance pushed the picture into a second time box office money maker.

Since Bonnie and Clyde, Beatty has acted sparingly; having the enviable option of picking his assignments. While Shampoo had the luxury of a nearly three year long hitch, Beatty's next project, a biography of Howard Hughes, promises to take less time. Beatty will direct the film and is in a horse race against two other studios which are planning the same story. With his prestige and power, he should finish ahead of the field.

Premieres

Conduct Unbecoming Late 19th century British India is the setting for this old fashioned courtroom drama. Camaraderie, honor and the sacred traditions of the British military system are called into question when Michael York defends an unjustly accused comrade against a charge of rape. Susannah York co-stars. (PG-1:47) September 26, 27

The Maids Two time Oscar winner Glenda Jackson heads the American Film Theatre production of Jean Genet's sardonic look at the master-servant relationship. A failed revenge plot to falsely incriminate the lover of their Parisian mistress provokes two imaginative maids to fulfill their favorite fantasy—poisoning their mistress. Susannah York and Vivien Merchant co-star.

Originally intended for an all-male cast, The Maids is from the pen of thief-turned dramatist Jean Genet. A criminal for most of his life, Frenchman Genet turned from full-time thief to part-time writer while in prison. But it took a 1948 presidential pardon from a sentence of life imprisonment to convince him to direct his full attention to writing. (1:35) September 17, 20, 29

The Master Gunfighter Billy Jack goes west as Tom Laughlin's martial arts folk hero reappears in early California as a sword-carrying machine gunning swashbuckler. An unjust tax forces a penniless Spanish family to resort to slaughter and theft to save their Rancho Deluxe. Superfly hero Ron O'Neal co-stars. (PG-1:51) September 12, 13, 24, 25, 28

Raymond Massey in Things to Come

Men are Not Gods Director Alexander Korda weaves a tangled but humorous web of adultery and deceit in this 1936 comedy. Shakespeare's Othello is played both on stage and in the private lives of the principals when a forged theatrical review propels a married, two-bit actor to fame, love and attempted murder. Miriam Hopkins stars as an extra-marital star-struck secretary. (1:27) September 9, 12, 14, 16

Shampoo Election eve 1968 is the backdrop for an artful blend of bedroom farce and social commentary. Ambitious Beverly Hills hairdresser Warren Beatty juggles his integrity and sanity against the bedrooms and bankrolls of his wealthy female clients. Julie Christie, Goldie Hawn and Oscar winner Lee Grant co-star. (R-1:52) September 19, 20

Things to Come H.G. Wells' prophetic bestseller provided the inspiration for Alexander Korda's 1936 science fiction epic on the state of the future. Stunning special effects highlight a trio of tales following the 100-year rivalry of two families for control of the fictitious metropolis of Everytown. Raymond Massey stars. (1:36) September 3, 4, 23, 28, 30

The Three Musketeers It's one for all, all for one and every man for himself as a star-studded cast headed by Michael York, Oliver Reed and Richard Chamberlain risk life and limb to preserve the honor of the queen and the stupidity of the king. Richard Lester directs the fractured first part of Dumas' ribald classic. (PG-1:47) September 5, 6, 17, 18, 21, 29

Features

Films finishing August premiere run: Jacques Brel Twenty-five songs by famed French troubadour Jacques Brel accompany a surrealistic journey into the minds of three Parisian characters. (1:38)

Love and Death Woody Allen stars as a 19th century militant coward in Russia who bumbles into heroism and a plot to assassinate Napoleon. Diane Keaton co-stars in this Groucho Marxian version of War and Peace. (PG-1:22)

The star of Billy Jack has battles of his own

The Master Gunfighter

To millions of moviegoers the half-breed, high-kicking Billy Jack is one of the few folk heroes left. A symbol of America's rugged individualism, Billy Jack has championed the cause of the underdog in two major movies.

However, the private war of the man behind Billy Jack has gone almost unnoticed. Tom Laughlin's one-man fight against the Hollywood film establishment has revolutionized a static industry.

After graduating from Marquette, Laughlin landed small parts in such pictures as South Pacific and Tea and Sympathy. He then produced, wrote, directed and starred in a low budget flick called The Proper Time. His second film, Born Losers, created the prototype for Billy Jack.

Again working in all capacities as writer, producer, director and star, Laughlin was joined by his producer-actress wife Delores Taylor. Together they made Billy Jack in record time. Rejecting the attempts of 20th Century-Fox to re-edit the film, Laughlin returned the money Fox had fronted for the production and found another distributor in Warner Brothers. Warner Brothers released the film, but withdrew it after a few weeks, claiming it was "a bomb." Convinced he had a film the public wanted to see, Laughlin sued Warner Brothers for the right to distribute the film himself. The case was settled out of court and thanks to some revolutionary distribution policies, Laughlin engineered Billy Jack into one of the top-grossing films of all-time. (In essence, Laughlin rented movie theatres and guaranteed a certain income to their owners, rather than splitting the gross receipts.)

The sequel, The Trial of Billy Jack, met with similar initial results and failed in its first attempt. Laughlin once again took matters into his own hands, using a marketing approach tailored specifically to the product and the film went on to become a huge success although not as big a smash as the original. (He released more than 1000 prints of the film, so the picture could be seen in one out of every ten theatres in the country.)

The Master Gunfighter was the first non-Billy Jack picture of Laughlin's new film production unit. But Billy Jack fans can take heart. Around Christmas a remake of Mr. Smith Goes to Washington will send the karate-chopping maverick to Washington as a U.S. Senator. September 12,13,24,25,28

Richard Lester's realism sometimes gets absurd

The Three Musketeers

Before shooting the film version of the Broadway musical A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum, director Richard Lester flew to Spain to view the elaborate Roman set. While pleased with the actual physical construction, Lester found it lacking in one important respect. It looked too new. Lester reacted in typical fashion. The production was delayed a few weeks while a family of gypsies moved in "to make it look shabby."

A penchant for realism and a bent toward the absurd have long been the trademarks of Lester's varied career. After briefly working in American television, Lester eventually went to England and the BBC. There he joined with Peter Sellers to create The Goon Show and an Academy Award nominated short, The Running, Jumping, Standing Still Film.

The fabulous success of his second feature, A Hard Day's Night, starring the Beatles, followed by three box office bonanzas (The Knack, A Funny Thing..., and Help!) made Lester the hottest director around. Unfortunately, three crashing commercial failures followed, and his reputation began to fade. In 1973 Lester's slide was halted by an out-of-the-blue offer to direct The Three Musketeers. And so, 132 years, countless abridged volumes and nine motion pictures later, Alexander Dumas' classic of conflict and intrigue among the French upper crust reached its fullest potential under Lester's unique mode of direction.

Noting that "I like to look for the absurd in any reality," Lester challenged writer George MacDonald Fraser to do the same, yet still produce an historically accurate script. This resulted in a number of intriguing touches and some dangerous situations. From Cardinal Richelieu's candle slide show to a chess game played with dogs dressed as pieces, Lester proved many times over that truth was stranger and certainly funnier than fiction. For added realism actors battled other actors instead of stuntmen, resulting in a number of casualties. Oliver Reed was stabbed through his right wrist and Michael York suffered a serious eye and leg injury.

The bumps and bruises were forgotten when Lester received rave reviews for the finished product. Time called it "an absolutely terrific movie" and as seen by the built-in trailer at the film's end, the fun has just begun. Next month HBO will present Lester's sequel, The Four Musketeers. Until then one for all and all for fun.

Who wears a blue velvet suit and a ruffled shirt, paces across the stage like a cat and is funny all over? It's David Brenner, a gangling young comedian who wows audiences that most other comics find exasperatingly solemn.

To hear Brenner tell it, he had a typical American background except for a Jewish mother who forbade wearing sneakers. He was the mouthy wise guy while in school on the rough side of Philadelphia. Today he dislikes flying and mocks the differences between the life styles of Los Angeles and New York City. Irreverent, but not too risqué for general audiences, Brenner examines the idiocy of modern life. His everyman's notion of what is funny is reminiscent of fellow Philadelphian Bill Cosby. Like Cosby, Brenner's body language heightens the hilarity of his punch lines.

Brenner had grown weary of playing small clubs when he jumped at an offer to go on the "Tonight" show in 1971. He considered his appearance one last fling and a chance to look sharp for the folks back home. Instead, his act stopped the show. Since that time—more than 30 "Tonight," 15 "Mike Douglas" and 15 "Merv Griffin" shows later—he has hit the big time—as well as America's funny bone.

Bronco busting is always fun to watch. But it is no laughing matter for riders, who have no seat belts to keep them in the saddle and no cushions to soften bone-jarring jolts while they ride and when they are uncereemoniously dumped. At the Professional Rodeo Cowboy Association in Salinas, California the men will take their lumps and bumps as best they can. September 5, 18

Professional Karate

A karate doubleheader will feature two world professional championship bouts. One match will be between middleweight titlists Kasim Dubar, a Yugoslavian now living in New York, and titlist Arthur (Butch) Bell of College Park, Md. Another Marylander—Mike Mobley of Baltimore—will face champion Fred Miller of New York in a light-heavyweight contest. September 9, 14, 18

Canadian Football

Canadian football isn't just the Yankee game played in a colder climate. It has three downs instead of four, an extra man in the backfield and a longer, wider field. This excitingly different game also has two great U.S. college stars, Anthony Davis and Johnny Rodgers. This month the Montreal Alouettes meet the Ottawa Rough Riders, in the first of six HBO telecasts. September 11

Ali-Norton Pre-Fight Special

Muhammad Ali, champion of poetry and pugilism, will have his gloves full against Ken Norton at Yankee Stadium later this month in a battle for the heavyweight title. Before the fight HBO will present a provocative special consisting of footage from past Ali-Norton bouts, a re-cap of each fighter's career and finally a short history of other heavyweight re-matches.
